

GREG MILLER

Manager,

Pittsburgh Land Bank

Gregory Miller is an urban designer with over seven years of experience tackling complex land use and urban design proposals throughout NYC. He is especially interested in how planning and design impacts the social and physical fabric of urban communities. During his time in NYC, Gregory has worked closely with a number of community groups and local elected officials on large complex mixed-use projects that will deliver critical community services, affordable housing and open space. He is a strong advocate for community engagement and participation in the planning and design phase of land use changes and believes this is paramount to successful urban environments. Gregory is a native of southwestern Pennsylvania and is acutely aware of the challenges many post-industrial areas throughout the region have faced due to disinvestment and population decline. Gregory looks forward to this new opportunity of working in Pittsburgh as the Land Bank manager because he genuinely believes this work can positively preserve and enhance many communities throughout the city. He also looks forward to setting roots in the city with his wife and two young children - his son is already vying for a position on the Steelers' offense!

###

The Pittsburgh Land Bank returns unproductive Real Property to beneficial reuse through an equitable, transparent, and public process, revitalizing neighborhoods to strengthen the City's tax base and support socially and economically diverse communities. To learn more, visit pghlandbank.org.